Interview with Mark MacGann, Senior Vice President, Head of European Government Affairs and Public Advocacy at NYSE Euronext, in La Tribune (January 24, 2012):

NYSE Euronext does not rule out an appeal if its merger with Deutsche Börse is rejected

With the final ruling by Brussels just a few days off, the transatlantic Bourse is concerned about an overly restrictive definition of “market” -- and says it is prepared to challenge this.

D-8. The countdown is accelerating for NYSE Euronext and Deutsche Börse. First announced on February 9, 2011, their proposed merger is set to be examined by the College of European Commissioners on or around February 1, 2012. And the hours ticking by are critical, as representatives of the Commissioners’ cabinets lay the groundwork. [Their] chiefs of staff will be meeting on January 30, and the two market operators are hoping this conclave will take a fresh look at the anti-trust unit’s recommendation on the proposed merger. The least opportunity will be seized in an effort to bring them around.

Commissioners have already received a letter celebrating the deal’s merits in terms of integrating European markets and regulation. And the world economic forum in Davos is an opportunity for more meetings. “We still have confidence in the European political process. It’s always been the case that, the College of Commissioners takes its decision following an in-depth examination of a report by the competition authorities. The DG-Comp has now completed its work,” says Mark MacGann, Senior Vice President, Head of European Government Affairs and Public Advocacy at NYSE Euronext. But what will happen if Brussels decides to follow the recommendations of the anti-trust team? It is not so certain that the NYSE Euronext leaders will sit back and accept it [“remain contemplative”].

An appeal cannot be excluded.

Derivatives markets

“The definition of ‘market’ used by DG-Comp (Ed: held to be trading in Europe and on regulated markets only, where NYSE Euronext and Deutsche Börse represent over 90%) is wrong. It’s incomprehensible! The European Parliament, the European Council, and the European Central bank, to cite only those institutions, have in the past taken the opposite position and underscored the worldwide nature of derivatives markets,” says Mark MacGann. Especially when the issue was regulation of those markets. “And the International Monetary Fund has highlighted the fierce competition between stock exchanges and the OTC market in derivatives.”

Some experts within the Commission do not share this definition, but are looking to dismantle silos -- groups that bring together the full range of activities, from order-matching through to delivery and settlement. “Opposing the NYSE Euronext-Deutsche Börse tie-up [just] to break up silos would have no legal foundation,” comments the head. “Today we have not ruled out taking the case to the European Court of Justice.”
