Arne Sorenson: Early this week we announced the exciting news that Marriott would be acquiring Starwood. I've had an opportunity to talk to the financial community and the associates of both companies. And now I'd like to take this opportunity to speak to our guests.

Our guests are what make us passionate about doing our jobs every day. This merger gives us the ability to take two great companies and keep the very best of each of them. We will ensure that the things you love about Marriott and Starwood are prioritized as we strive towards our vision of being the world's favorite travel company.

This will be particularly true for our loyalty programs. The top priority for us as we come together is to treat our guests with the care and attention they deserve. We recognize that Marriott Rewards and Starwood Preferred Guest, or SPG, are two of the finest loyalty programs in the industry, each with devoted followers. While we will be spending a great deal of time in the coming months developing our strategy for SPG and Marriott Rewards, our members should take comfort in the fact that we know without a doubt these loyalty programs are the most powerful tool we have for developing strong relationships with our guests. The SPG program was one of the most attractive aspects of our acquisition of Starwood. To state the obvious, devaluing points or member benefits is not the way to preserve and strengthen these programs.

As the merger of the two companies progresses, we will share more information as well as create an opportunity for travel thought leaders and members to provide input. The insights we gather will be instrumental in helping us deliver the most rewarding experiences for you, our most loyal guests.

With this merger, we have a tremendous opportunity. We plan to embrace it to create a hospitality loyalty program that values the best of both programs and then some. Thank you and safe travels.
